

During the summer, I see over 50 junior golfers each week at the Junior Golf Camps in Pebble Beach and the most common error I see in their backswings is the club moving too far inside during the takeaway and too steep at the top of the backswing. Since the golf swing is a chain reaction of events, if the club goes to the inside on the takeaway then the only way the club can get over the shoulder is to become too steep on the backswing.

The most common backswing mistake is the club moving too much to the inside on the takeaway and then too steep at the top of the backswing.

To fix the mistake of taking the club too much inside put a club on the ground just outside the ball that is parallel with your intended target line. Then take the club back for the first couple of feet parallel with the club on the ground. Practice hitting balls this way and you will have a good takeaway in no time.
