

Put a club down just outside of the ball on your intended target line to practice taking the club back correctly.

A good way to flatten the top of your swing is to do what I call "baseball" swings. Start with the club a couple of feet above the ground and then make an athletic swing. The club at the top of the backswing should be at the same angle as the club was when it began off the ground. You can check where the club is on your backswing if you stop and look at it directly or in a mirror. Since the club started from an elevated position the club shaft is flatter than a normal swing when the club starts on the ground. It is much easier to make the club swing in a flatter circle if the club is swung off of the ground. Take a couple of baseball swings and hit the ball off of a tee. If you continue to practice this way you will be able to fix your backswing in no time.

A good way to fix a backswing that is too steep is to take what I call "baseball swings." Begin with the club off of the ground a couple of feet and make a couple of practice swings. Then hit a ball off of a tee. If you continue to do this you will be able to fix your backswing and make it flatter in no time.